

VELUSE AGENCY STANDARD OPERATING PROCEDURE (SOP) DEPARTMENT:

Executive Operations & Leadership
SUBJECT: The Executive Assistant (EA) Force Multiplier & Metric-Based Recruiting

PURPOSE: To establish Veluse Agency's elite standard for executive time management and talent acquisition. A CEO's time is the most expensive and valuable asset in the entire business 1, 2. If our executives or our Med Spa clients are bogged down by administrative drag, the business cannot scale. This SOP details the exact protocol for deploying a high-horsepower Executive Assistant to act as a force multiplier and the metric-driven framework required to hire them.

PART 1: CREATING "TWO WEEKS FOR EVERY WEEK"

The ultimate life hack for an entrepreneur is to literally buy back time. By aggressively delegating the mundane, you can essentially manufacture two work weeks out of every single week 3.

We achieve this by having the EA manage the complete outsourcing of "humaning" 4, 5. Humaning consists of the baseline tasks required to exist: feeding yourself, cleaning the house, doing laundry, and running basic errands 4, 5.

- The ROI of Time: An executive must calculate their hourly rate (annual income divided by 2,000 hours) 6. If your time is worth $500 an hour, spending it on laundry or inbox triage is a catastrophic financial loss.
- The EA's Directive: The EA is tasked with either executing or managing vendors for all tedious, low-leverage tasks 4, 7. By coordinating meals, managing cleaners, and handling administrative friction, the EA buys the executive back over 96 hours a month, unlocking an entirely new week of purely productive, revenue-generating "Maker" time 8, 9.

PART 2: THE ELITE EA & "SPEED AS A NON-NEGOTIABLE"

A high-level EA is not a secretary; they are an intelligent, highly-paid operational partner.

Alex Hormozi noted that after going 0 for 12 on EAs, he finally found an elite EA by screening for a borderline "psychopath" level of dedication to speed and execution 10.

At Veluse Agency, our EAs must adhere to the following operational standards:

- Speed Over Everything: Speed is non-negotiable 10, 11. The EA must respond to the executive within 60 seconds, no matter when the message is sent 10. When an executive reaches out for a task, the EA is the immediate constraint to the company's momentum; total responsiveness clears the bottleneck 2, 10.
- General Intelligence & First Drafts: We screen for raw horsepower and high general intelligence 2, 12. An elite EA must be smart enough to take a vague directive, execute the "first draft" of a complex project to 80% completion, and allow the executive to simply tweak the final 20% 12.
- Calendar Defense (The Maker/Manager Divide): The EA must ruthlessly defend the executive's time. They are strictly instructed never to book a meeting during the morning "Maker" block (e.g., 4:00 AM to 12:00 PM) 13, 14. All "Manager" meetings must be stacked in the afternoon and booked from back-to-front (e.g., starting at 4:00 PM, then 3:00 PM) to preserve maximum uninterrupted white space 13, 15.
- Closing the Loops: The EA tracks all ongoing projects and effectively "closes the loop" on tasks, constantly reminding the executive of pending decisions and following up on delegated items so nothing falls through the cracks 11, 12.

PART 3: THE METRIC-BASED ROLE DESCRIPTION

To recruit an EA of this caliber—or to recruit any elite A-Player for Veluse Agency or our Med Spa clients—we completely abandon vague behavioral interview questions. Instead, we use the Metric-Based Role Description framework to instantly separate the masters from the amateurs.

1. The Quantity and Quality of Metrics You can measure someone's exact skill level by the quality and quantity of the metrics they use to describe their past roles 16-19. When interviewing an operations or HR candidate, if they say they track "team happiness," they are a beginner 19. An elite candidate will immediately cite complex, business-driving metrics such as their "cost of acquiring talent," their average "time to fill" a role, and their "two-way fit" percentage (the percentage of hires where both the manager and employee rate the fit a 10/10 after 90 days) 18, 20, 21.

2. Tying Actions to Revenue Every candidate must answer the ultimate business question: "How does what you do make the company more money?" 22-24.

- If they cannot clearly articulate how their specific daily inputs translate into the ultimate outputs of the business (getting customers or making customers worth more), they do not understand their job and will not be hired 16, 24-26.
- Example: An elite EA or finance operator shouldn't say "I manage expenses." They should say, "I compile and analyze expenses to identify areas where we can decrease costs, freeing up capital to acquire more customers and increase gross profit" 24, 27.

By establishing metric-based definitions of success, we ensure that every single hire—from the front-desk Med Spa setter to the Veluse Agency CEO's right-hand EA—operates as a measurable, scalable asset rather than an unquantifiable liability.
